CLIENT PROJECT | B2B AGENCY · LEAD GENERATION

Turn generic outreach into relevant sales conversations.

A four-email cold sequence for GrowthLab, a B2B agency, written to earn a reply before asking for a meeting.

PROJECT 1 | MARCH 2025 | COPYWRITER: ABDUL TAHIR

Natural tone | Short structure | Curiosity-led hook

AUDIENCE	Decision-makers at B2B companies who are working on their outbound.
THE BRIEF	GrowthLab's outreach was being opened but not answered. The emails read like templates, so prospects had no particular reason to reply.
GOAL	Increase reply rates by replacing generic outreach with conversational copy.
MY APPROACH	I rewrote the sequence in a natural tone, with short paragraphs and one question per email. The first email doesn't ask for a meeting. It offers an idea and lets the prospect decide whether to see it.
DELIVERABLES	A four-email sequence with send timing (Days 1, 4, 8 and 13) and fields for personalisation.

How the sequence builds

01 Start with an observation
Email 1 opens with something specific about the prospect's business or market, which gives the message a reason to exist.

02 Offer something useful first
Email 2 shares the angle itself. The prospect gets an idea to react to before anyone asks for their time.

03 Get the targeting right
Email 3 raises the buyer segment. Who receives the email matters as much as what it says.

The sequence

Four emails over 13 days. Emails 2 to 4 continue in the same thread.

01 / EMAIL 1 • DAY 1
Start the conversation

Hi [First Name],

[Specific observation about their business or target market] caught my eye.

It gave me an idea for how [Company] could approach [buyer type]: lead with [specific buyer problem], then connect it to your offer.

At GrowthLab, we help B2B teams build outreach around the buyer's situation, so there's a clear reason to reply.

Want me to send over the opening email I have in mind?

GrowthLab

02 / EMAIL 2 • DAY 4
Give them something useful | Same email thread

Hi [First Name],

Here's the angle I mentioned:

"[One sentence connecting a verified observation to a problem your prospect can solve.]"

That gives the buyer something specific to respond to before you ask for their time.

For [Company], I'd build the follow-ups around the same problem, with a different reason to reply in each one.

Would a short sequence outline be useful?

GrowthLab

03 / EMAIL 3 • DAY 8
Address the targeting problem | Same email thread

Hi [First Name],

One other thought: who receives the email matters as much as what it says.

For [Company], I'd start with [specific buyer segment] because [verified reason the offer is relevant to them].

A smaller, focused campaign would give your team a clearer view of which message gets a response.

Is that a segment you're already approaching?

[Sender Name]
GrowthLab

04 / EMAIL 4 • DAY 13
Close without pressure | Same email thread

Hi [First Name],

I'll leave this here after today.

If improving outbound is on your list, I can send the email outline for [Company] for you to review. No meeting needed.

If the timing isn't right, no problem.

Should I send it over?

Copy decisions

TONE	Plain wording, as if one person were writing to another. Nothing in it reads like an agency brochure.
STRUCTURE	Short paragraphs and a single question at the end of each email, so the next step is easy to answer.
THE HOOK	The first email leads with an idea (“the opening email I have in mind”) rather than a request for time.
PERSONALISATION	Bracketed fields such as [Company] and [Specific observation] are filled for each prospect, using a detail that can be verified.
THE ENDING	The last email offers the outline with no meeting attached, and makes it easy to say no.

Sequence at a glance

DAY	EMAIL	WHAT IT DOES
Day 1	Start the conversation	Opens with an observation and offers to send the opening email.
Day 4	Give them something useful	Shares the angle and offers a short sequence outline.
Day 8	Address the targeting problem	Asks whether the suggested buyer segment is already being approached.
Day 13	Close without pressure	Offers the outline, no meeting needed.
